About the Author

Darshan Desale is an Indian author and storyteller writing across mythology, psychological suspense, horror, mystery, and speculative fiction. His writing journey began during his school years and developed into a body of work spanning novels and audio fiction.

His debut novel, Manu, blends Indian mythology, fantasy, science fiction, folklore, and questions surrounding life and existence. His second novel, Karma, explores fate, power, moral choice, and the consequences of attempting to interfere with destiny. His later novel, Yesterday Night I Killed My Husband, moves into psychological mystery, beginning with an impossible confession: a woman says she has killed her husband, but the man is still alive.

Alongside his novels, Desale has written numerous Marathi audio stories across horror, supernatural fiction, mystery, and thriller. His work reflects a continuing interest in mythology, the unexplained, human psychology, and the questions that exist between belief and possibility.

The Writer

“I have always been drawn to questions that do not have easy answers.”

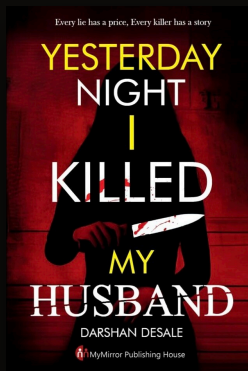

What lies beneath an old myth? What happens when memory cannot be trusted? Where does belief end and possibility begin? My stories usually begin somewhere around those questions.

I like taking something familiar — a myth, a fear, a memory, a strange idea — and looking at it from a different direction. Sometimes that leads me into mythology. Sometimes into horror, mystery, or the darker corners of the human mind.

I don't want every story to explain everything. I want it to leave something behind — a question, an image, or a feeling that stays after the last page.
